> Translated from the Courrier des Etats Unis. Abd-cl-Kader.

This Arab Emir who at the end of the French war with Algeria remained a prisoner to the French government has since his captivity become a member of the Asiatic Society of Paris. He appears to have been amusing his time, which otherwise might have hung heavily upon his hands, by writing a book, which he has sent to M. Reinaud of the Institute, to be presented to him as an offering to the society of which he is the President. The Paris Moniteur contains a report addressed by the learned conservator of oriental manuscripts to the minister of public instruction, respecting the Emir's book. The manuscript which is at present deposited in the imperial library is divided into three chapters, preceded by an introduction. M. Reinaud has given an analysis of this curious production and a translation of the most important passages. In the introduction Abd-el-Kader attempts to enforce a love of study, and points out methods for making reading profitable to one's self and others. In the first chapter where he treats especially of the importance and the advantages of the sciences, the author complains (is it entirely without reason?) that the learned men of Europe, and particularly the scholars of France, who have carried their researches so far, and reached so high a degree of perfection in all the branches of human knowledge, do not think of elevating their minds towards the author of all things, towards God who rules the universe by a supreme wisdom. "Never," he says, "are they heard to speak of the divinity in their conversations, and never is he spoken of in their books."

"We see that at the bottom these three religions are only ene, and that the differences which separate them are mostly on points of detail. They may be compared to the children of the same father who are born of different mothers. To reject these three religions or to reject one part and receive the other is a little thing. If Musselmen and Christians would believe me, they might agree and treat each other as brethren, in principal and in form. Unfortunately they do not believe me, apparently because it has entered into the designs of Providence to reserve to the Messiah alone the mission of bringing Musselmen and christians together. This will take place as the end of the world draws near, when the Messiah will return to the earth, but this result he will not obtain by the effect of persuasion, although he will be endowed with the power of raising the dead and healing the leprous and blind, it will be by the power of the sword and shedding blood. As for me, if a man desirous of knowing the truth should enquire of me, and should understand my words, I could easily bring him to the point, and that not by imposing my opinions upon him, but by compelling him by the evidence of my reasonings to do homage to the truth."

This comparison between Judaism, Christianity and Mahometanism, this appeal to a species of fusion, this appearance of toleration, the manner of considering religious forms as transitory, this alleged uniformity of symbols, and at the same time the vague tincture of European rationalism joined to an altogether oriental reasoning would be, if there was anything to be seen in it but the expression of an individual opinion, one of the most remarkable symp-A distinguished public speaker not long since il- toms of the weakening, or the approaching transfor-
